To whom it may concern

I am writing this letter to explain how society can better deal with teen violence.

To begin, I believe one way society can help prevent teen violence is to encourage more teens to sign up for after school activities. Encouraging them to do so will help them get to know others and also make new friends, which will then help with self-esteem and confidence. Another way to help prevent teen violence is to always encourage teens to include others. Everyone is different whether it's colour, gender, race, religion, appearance or interests. Everyone should be accepted equally, because everyone has the right to be different. Teens also should always try to be strong, not just on the outside, but inside as well. They should always believe in themselves and put their minds to what they believe in.

I have read about too many teens that have committed suicide because they were not accepted. Not everyone has to be friends with everyone. But violence is not the answer. I'd love to say we can stop violence between teens completely, but unfortunately there is no possible way. Thank you for taking the time to read this letter and my point of view on teen violence.

Sincerely
